PREFACE

THE Vitellius Psalter, here edited for the first time, is one of six extant glossed Gallican psalters written in England within the period of approximately one century, 975-1075. With three of these psalters, those traditionally designated Arundel, Spelman, and Tiberius, it shares a common place of origin at Winchester, one of the most active centers of manuscript production in the tenth and eleventh centuries. Of the fourteen glossed psalters to both Roman and Gallican texts, the Vitellius manuscript is the most difficult to read because of damage suffered in the Cottonian fire, and for this reason it has been generally less accessible than the others.

In an edition of this kind of text it is essential that the gloss be reproduced precisely as it stands in the manuscript, since expansions of abbreviations and emendations of supposed errors all too frequently obscure important evidence of syntax, phonology, the glossator's use of a particular word, and the like. I have therefore retained the manuscript reading as faithfully as possible and have confined proposed emendations and expansions of ambiguous abbreviations to the Introduction and textual notes. The Latin text has been presented somewhat less rigorously, although a majority of the abbreviations and all observed manuscript alterations are discussed or cited.

The introductory matter is selective of points which are important for an understanding of the manuscript, general features of the Latin and gloss, and textual procedure. Two of the earlier students of Old English psalters called attention to the significance of the vocabulary in Vitellius, Lindelöf in 1914 ("Immerhin besitze von G . . . eine nicht geringe anzahl von kürzeren auszügen und einzelnen glossen") and Wildhagen in 1920 ("Er [G's glossator] schreibt nicht mechanisch und gedankenlos ab, sondern gibt oft selbständige Übertragungen"), and it has been found profitable to pursue this subject in some detail. The complex, often bewildering, problem of psalter relationships is not dealt with here, except in one note. Previous discussions of this nexus have been based on partial collations, especially those made by Lindelöf in 1904, but until an exhaustive collation of any one group or of all the psalters is made, reconstructions and conclusions must remain to a certain extent tentative. For the most searching inquiry of the Gallican psalter relationships, the reader is referred to Mr. Sisam's Appendix II in the recent edition of the Salisbury Psalter.

The number of specialized problems encountered in preparing the edition has required the assistance of many scholars, to whom it is a pleasure to record my thanks. Dr. C. E. Wright and Mr. Kenneth Sisam provided much help with paleographical details. Dr. Helmut Gneuss generously shared with me his wide knowledge of medieval psalter tradition. To Professor Sherman Kuhn I owe many excellent suggestions about procedures to follow in editing a psalter text. I am indebted to Professor Harry Caplan for many discussions involving questions of the latinity, and also for closely reading the Introduction. In addition, I am grateful for two generous grants from Cornell University: from the Research Fund of the Graduate School and the Grant-in-Aid Fund of the Department of English. Finally, I wish to thank the Trustees of the British Museum for permission to reproduce photographic plates of the manuscript.

INTRODUCTION

THE MANUSCRIPT. For a description of the contents, collation, and foliation of MS Cotton Vitellius E. xviii, see N. R. Ker, Catalogue of Manuscripts Containing Anglo-Saxon (Oxford, 1957), article 224.[1] The manuscript was badly burned in the 1731 Cottonian fire, and the edges of some leaves have crumbled since then. As Ker notes, the "extreme measurements now . . . represent approximately the area of the written space," and this is especially true of the psalter and canticles, which appear on folios 18^{r}-140^{v}. Although marginal loss, in varying degrees, occurs on almost every folio, it is surprising how much of the psalter text—both Latin and Old English glosses—has remained intact. Parts of words, usually the first one or two letters, are sometimes lost on the extreme top, bottom, or side margins, but such loss is relatively small.[2] Wherever the Latin and the OE words have escaped crumbling, they are almost always legible in direct sunlight, even on those folios which have been most severely scorched.[3] There are eight small fragments[4] which have

[1] The account of the manuscript in Wanley's Catalogus (1705) is on pp. 222f.

[2] Many of the majuscule letters in red, blue, or green have been excised.

[3] On approximately 26 of the 123 folios containing the psalter and canticle text the damage has been particularly severe; these sections are ff. 94^{r}–100^{v}, 104^{r}–116^{v}, 121^{r}–124^{r}, 127^{v}–131^{v}, and 139^{r}–140^{v}. On badly burnt leaves, especially in ff. 128^{v}–131^{r}, the ink of the gloss has often flaked off almost entirely; many of the words, however, can be made out from the scratch of the stylus.

[4] The fragments are now on ff. 21^{r}, 70^{r}, 74^{r}, 92^{v}, 124^{v}, 127^{r}, 137^{r}, and 138^{r}.

been mismounted. In most cases the fragment has been mounted on the wrong side of the folio, and sometimes it has carelessly been placed on top of another word. The contents of the fragments, wherever legible, are given in the textual notes, and an attempt has been made to find their correct location.

Date and Provenance. The date of the manuscript is traditionally given as the middle of the eleventh century; Wormald[1] assigns "ca. 1060" as the date for the calendars. There appears to be no reason to doubt that the manuscript was written at Winchester, but opinion is divided as to whether the scriptorium out of which it came was at the Cathedral or New Minster. Bishop[2] and Wildhagen[3] favor Winchester Cathedral, whereas Wormald suggests New Minster.[4] Sisam notes some evidence[5] which tentatively suggests that J originated at New Minster; if G and J are closely related, as I believe (see below), this evidence would also strengthen the case for G's origination at New Minster.

Psalm Introductions. A hand roughly contemporary with that of the main scribe has added introductions in red to each of the psalms and canticles. Although they are not glossed, I have retained them in the edition because such accretions are sometimes helpful in determining the history or relationships of manuscripts.[6] Almost all of [5] Ed. of K, p. 58, n.3. Sisam observes that a phrase in J's litany is closely parallel to a clause in a slightly later New Minster book.

[6] Most of the other glossed psalters contain introductions, but they are generally briefer than those in G; as in G, they usually are later additions. Shorter introductions occur also in MSS Harley 603 and 2904, the introductions, which are written in spaces left blank at the end of one psalm and the beginning of the next or in the margin, contain both a conventional rubric such as Psalmus Dauid and an interpretation from exegesis such as uox Aecclesiae ad Christum. The source from which the introductions are most consistently derived is the commentary, In Psalmorum Librum Exegesis.[1] The exegetical expansions are usually from the argumentum, occasionally from the explanationes (as Pss. 36, 38, 57, 90, 95, 96), and sometimes appear to be paraphrases or adaptations of the commentary (as Pss. 106, 136).[2] As a result of either the imperfect state of the immediate source from which it was copied or of carelessness in the process of copying itself, G's text is often fragmentary and corrupted.

OE argumenta to Psalms 2-50 are written in the margins in the hand of the main glossator, but since the margins have been severely damaged by fire and deterioration, the argumenta are very fragmentary, occasionally missing altogether; I have not attempted to reproduce them in this edition.[3] Similar, but not identical, argumenta occur also in P, but as Celia and Kenneth Sisam have demonstrated by collating the two,[4] G's argumenta do not derive from

[2] A similar use of In Psal. Lib. Exeg. in the Paris Psalter introductions is discussed thoroughly by J. D. Bruce, The Anglo Saxon Version of the Book of Psalms Commonly Known as the Paris Psalter (Baltimore, 1894). Although both G and P derive these texts from the same source, the selections in both are distinctly dissimilar, dispelling any possibility that the two are related. A corrupted text of the argumenta from the same source also occurs in the Southampton Psalter (Irish MS C. 9, St. John's College, Cambridge).

P, and P cannot derive its text from G; hence "there was no contact between the two manuscripts." This conclusion does not rule out, of course, the possibility of some form of distant relationship, perhaps through a partial or complete recension of P which was available at Winchester.

Canticles. Eleven of the original fifteen canticles are complete in the MS, two (I and IV) are incomplete, and two (II, III) are missing. The edition follows the sequence of the MS, and the numbers supplied are those of Mearns's order:[1] 1, 4-6, 11, 7-10, 13-14, 12, 15. The Canticle Te decet laus (no. 18 in Mearns's Third Series) occurs at the end of Canticle XI as part of the original text. Mearns remarks that this canticle "is seldom found except in Benedictine books, added to, or connected with, the Te Deum."[2] The Te decet laus does not appear in any of the other glossed psalter MSS which contain canticles, and its appearance in other early English MSS seems to be quite rare; Mearns cites nine MSS in which it occurs, but all of them are Continental.[3]

Hands of Text and Gloss. The Latin text of the psalter and canticles is in the hand of one scribe throughout. In a few instances a contemporary corrector's hand (designated B in the textual notes) has finished a word or added words in spaces left blank by the original scribe: e.g., at Ps. 104.3 on f. 99^{r} hand B has added laudamini in nomine; at Ps. 136.1 on f. 123^{v} the original scribe has begun re-, but the rest of this word and the next are added by B, -cordaremur sion. The most extensive example of this hand occurs on f. 104^{r}, where B has added much of the text for Ps. 106.33-36. Also, several later hands have made corrections or additions: e.g., the same hand (probably of the late twelfth century) has added deus in Pss. 21.21 and 25.9 and has corrected ruiens to rugiens in Ps. 21.14; at Ps. 103.24 a hand, probably of the thirteenth century, has added the abbreviation $\overline{GLA}$ (= Gloria). A hand which is definitely postmedieval (perhaps of the sixteenth century) has made corrections in the prayer immediately following Ps. 151 on f. 131^{v}; this hand appears to be in imitation of the original Latin style. The rubrics and psalm introductions in red are in a hand contemporary with, but different from, the main hand.

[2] Ibid., p. 67.

[3] For the later (13th- and 14th-century) monastic use of the Te decet laus, see J. B. L. Tolhurst, The Monastic Breviary of Hyde Abbey, Winchester (Henry Bradshaw Society, vol. LXXX; London, 1942), VI, 9, 189.

When the original scribe overlooked a word in copying, he wrote the word in the margin, usually to the left and slightly above the incomplete line of text, prefixing the word with a character which looks like a human embryo. In a few instances a corrector has added a word in the margin, marking both the word and the place where it belongs in the text by a small h hooped on the top stroke. Infrequently, hyphens have been added later to join separated syllables of a word in the same line, but never to join the end of one line with the beginning of the next.

The gloss is in two hands, both of which are different from that of the main scribe who wrote the Latin. The first hand, the main glossator, glossed the psalter and canticles from the beginning (f. 18^{r}) to the Magnificat (f. 138^{r}). The hand of the superimposed gloss (see "Added Glosses" below) is that of the main glossator's. The second hand begins at the Magnificat and continues to the end (f. 140^{v}) of the canticles. Once the new hand has taken up the glossing, the main glossator does not entirely disappear, for he has intermixed a few glosses in his own hand (on f. 138^{r}) with those of the new glossator. There is reason to believe that the second hand was that of a novice and that the main glossator had turned over to him the task of completing the manuscript, perhaps as a serious exercise. The new hand is distinctly less careful and certain; the letters are clumsily made and the strokes often shaky. Furthermore, there is a curious mixture of traditions in the forming of letters, e.g., both the early and late (hooked)

g appear, the ascenders are higher and split (a tendency towards elaboration), and the crossbar of the e is drawn out and hooked. The unsureness of the hand and the indiscriminate mixing of older and newer forms suggest the work of a younger man; the glosses added by the main glossator to the work of the other may have been intended as exemplars.

There are a few instances in which a gloss has been added by a different, sometimes later, hand. At Ps. 8.3 7 þone forhosedan is added in a different, but contemporary, hand; at Cant. XV.16 godas ac is added by a hand which is perhaps slightly later than that of the second glossator. At Cant. V.14 a much later hand (early thirteenth century) has erased an original OE gloss and introduced ME blast. A postmedieval hand (cursive; probably sixteenth century) has touched up faded glosses and added glosses at Pss. 11.9 and 100.3, 5. The number of different hands and their chronological spread in both the Latin and gloss suggest that the psalter has had an interesting history, but because the evidence is so slight (sporadic corrections and additions) it has not been possible to determine what that history may have been.

Abbreviations. The Latin abbreviations are the common ones of the time and are usually indicated by the horizontal bar, as dꝰ = deus, Qm̄ = Quoniam, and pleb̄ = plebis; except at the beginning of a verse, the ampersand (&) is used throughout, although, exceptionally, the form ⁊ = et appears at least once. Both ÷ and ē are occasionally used for est. Abbreviations occur more frequently in the Psalm introductions, and some forms occur there which do not appear in the main text, such as n̄ = non, p̊ = post, and the tilted ↄ (as in consequit[2]) = -ur.

There are at least three instances in which the aspirate is expressed (probably in the hand of a later corrector) by the Greek half-eta symbol (ⱶ: sometimes called the spiritus asper). At Ps. 144.7 aspiration is regular, ⱶ*abundantie*, but the symbol is used exceptionally at Ps. 108.5 ⱶ*odium* and Canticle VI.41 ⱶ*oderunt*.

In the gloss the common abbreviations 7 = and, ꝥ = þæt, and ꝺ[1] = oþþe (Lat. uel) are used regularly throughout. The abbreviations driħ and driħt gloss dominus and its declensional forms, and drihtn̄ is sometimes employed for domino or domini. When the glossator writes the word out, drihten usually = dominus, -um, or -e, drihtne = domino, and drihtnes = domini. Since there are, however, a few unusual or ambiguous instances (e.g., 21.28 dominum. drihtene, 24.15 dominum. drihtne, 26.14 dominum. drihtenes [twice], 88.19 domini. drihten, and VII.61 domino. drihten), I have not attempted to expand these abbreviations in the edition. The horizontal bar over final vowels stands for m, as þā = þam, although in the word forðā it is not always certain whether the final consonant should be read m or n, since occasionally the form forðan appears (e.g., at Pss. 5.5, 6.3, 6.6, 53.6, 68.2). When the bar stands over a consonant, it is also not always clear what ending is intended, e.g., 10.5 heofen̄ (heofenum or heofenan?), 73.7 þin̄ (þine?), and 102.7 israhel̄ (?). The other marks which appear are the apostrophe, as at 18.7 heofen' (heofenum or heofenan?) and 21.21 min' (= mine), and the waved vertical stroke (which in Latin = -re, -er), as at 71.11 cyning^{s} (= cyningas).

Punctuation. The method of punctuating the Latin text is irregular. The commonest mark for the midverse division is the punctus elevatus, ⁖, and the verse end is marked usually by a single point (slightly elevated above the ruled line). Occasionally the verse is punctuated ⁘ or ⁘. Infrequently, the midverse is marked by · (as at Ps. 89.3, 6, 8), and the verse end by ⁖ (as Ps. 88.47, 48, 49, 50). Because it is inconsistent and often effaced, I have not retained the MS punctuation; the verse end is marked here in the traditional manner with a point.

Accents. The only mark of accentuation in the Latin and Old English is the acute sign, which I have retained in the edition wherever it is clear in the manuscript. The accent occurs sporadically some twenty-three times in the Latin, forty-two times in the Old English. As is common in Latin MSS, the accent frequently falls on monosyllabic words, such as té, eś, but more frequently in this MS the accent marks stress. The following examples reveal that the scribe had a good ear for Latin pronunciation: áttrahit, framée, áeris, ínopi, calígo, alienígene, sísare, and longánimis. Some of the Hebrew words which are accented are cherubím, ááron (accent as diaeresis), effraím, and beniamín.

The acute mark in the gloss often falls on monosyllables (e.g., sár, lác, bár, sæd, án), monosyllabic prefixes (e.g., ástigon, ińcleofum), inflected monosyllables (e.g., tíde, áre), vowel length (e.g., belúcan, cócere, úpahófe, swáswá, astíðedan), and in some cases the mark presumably indicates stress (e.g., gewínn, cýning, hérincg, gecéas, gewánað). Unusually, the accent marks ge- at Ps. 108.7: gédemed bið.[1]

Latin Changes. Occasional alterations of readings are found throughout the Latin text, a feature which is common to many of the English psalter manuscripts, glossed and unglossed. In Vitellius the changes occur singly, i.e., they do not appear in batches in any one psalm or group of psalms, so that there is no apparent consistency or pattern for them. Nor are the changes confined to any one portion of the psalter, say the first fifty psalms, but are spread unevenly from Ps. 2.9 through Ps. 143.4. Altogether there are more than seventy alterations of readings, some of which were made before the glossing, some after, although the preponderance of changes occurred later than the gloss. As we might expect in eleventh-century England, where the Gallican version was supplanting the Roman,[2]

[1] Many of the added glosses carry the accent; see, e.g., Ps. 24.

[2] The names 'Roman' and 'Gallican' derive from the use of the texts in Rome and Gaul, respectively, during and after the ninth century. The RPs. represents the first revision made by St. Jerome of an Old Latin text, while the GPs. represents Jerome's second revision, the version which today is known as the Vulgate.

the greater number of changes here is from the Roman to the Gallican text. This fact alone, however, will not account for all the changes, since many of them appear to be a reinstatement of the Roman, or a variant, reading. For example, GPs. innocentes at Ps. 14.5 is altered to RPs. -em, RPs. statuit at Ps. 17.34 is changed to GPs. statuens, while at Ps. 20.2 an (older?) variant tuo is changed to RPs.-GPs. tuum, and RPs. uoluntate at 20.3 is altered to the variant -em.[1] Many of the changes are of inflectional endings, such as RPs. hereditatem to GPs. -e (82.13) and RPs. pluit to GPs. -et (10.7), and frequently a word has been added or deleted, such as omnes (RPs.) added at 44.13 and domine (RPs.) erased at 85.17.[2]

Some of the alterations are of particular interest because they involve rare readings, viz., readings which are known in only one or two other manuscripts. At Ps. 5.8 et has been added; according to Weber's collations et occurs here elsewhere in C alone. At 25.9 deus is added and at 129.8 redemet is changed to -it, readings which are recorded elsewhere only from CL and CLM, respectively. The word eis (105.9), which is cited elsewhere from CELM, has been changed (or corrected?) to eos. It is possible, of course, that some of these instances are not indicative of manuscript relationships but are simply coincidences. Because such evidence of altered readings is important for the study of Roman and Gallican psalter traditions in England and may also be useful in establishing manuscript relationships, I have retained the Latin text as it now exists, indicating the nature of the changes in the textual commentary. In the few cases in which the original reading has been made illegible by erasure I have suggested what the reading may have been by reference to Weber or the Biblia . . . Vulgatam X.

[1] For all of the changes cited in the textual notes, the reader should consult Dom Weber's excellent edition of the RPs.

[2] In addition to the changes of readings there are, of course, a number of corrections of errors; e.g., illis cor. to illi (21.31), uocis to uoci (67.34), sperant to -at (83.13), &c.

Corrections of the Latin orthography are not uncommon and are presumably in accordance with the pronunciation of the time. For example, tamquam is frequently altered to tanquam, numquid to nun-, circumdate to circun-, exsoluebam to -ban at 68.5, and mihi to michi. The erasure of h from the exceptional spelling hoderunt at Ps. 67.2 is also apparently a regularization of pronunciation.[1] In the original spelling, t is sometimes spelled d, as capud (26.6); one consonant is written where a double consonant is usual, such as mitentes (= mitt-, 77.9), deglutisent (= -ssent, 123.3), and sagitas (= -ttas, 143.6); and single consonants are doubled, as mittiges (= mit-, 93.13) and commedit (= come-, 104.35). Note also the unusual tsue (= sue) at Ps. 32.16.

Gloss: Added Glosses. An interesting problem of the Vitellius Psalter is the appearance of many letters and words which have been added to the original gloss by the main glossator. The added glosses may appear as early as Ps. 8.17 uerticem. hnifel ł hnoll,* or very probably at Ps. 9.30 insidiatur. syrwað (ł sætað), but they do not begin to accumulate until Ps. 17, from which point they occur densely to Ps. 31. After Ps. 31 their appearance is continuous, but meager and sporadic; at least one example appears in most (but by no means all) of the psalms following Ps. 31 up to and including Ps. 135, and there are at least three added glosses in the canticles. Pss. 73 and 77 contain a relatively large number of these glosses, seven and eight, respectively.

Added glosses are often instructive about glossatorial habit and intention, and in the OE glossed psalters they can be particularly helpful in determining manuscript relationships, so that I have felt it necessary to make a distinction in the edition between the original gloss and the secondary gloss material. Such a distinction in G, however, is extremely difficult, because the hand of the added glosses is the same as that of the original glosses, with the further complications of manuscript damage. A close examination of the glosses, especially in Pss. 17-30, suggested the following criteria for determining the added material:

1) The ink of an added letter or word is often lighter and browner than that of the original gloss. But shade or color of ink is not alone a conclusive indication.

2) The impression is approximately the same as the original, but frequently less sharp and clear.

3) The position and size of letters are important. (a) In double glosses, the new gloss is often higher, and in smaller script, than the first, because of cramped space. (b) The new gloss is sometimes extended into the margin or run against or curved around another gloss. (c) When the new gloss stands in an open space, it is often larger in script than the original; the letters may also be thicker, perhaps because of a change of ink or stylus.

4) In double glosses, the new gloss generally follows the first entry, but in a few instances it precedes.

5) For added letters, a stroke on the glossing line is sometimes made to indicate where the letter (placed above) should go, such as g$^{e}_{f}$atu; also, a sharp contrast in ink shade of such letters helps to determine whether they were added later.

Contrasts, however sharp, of ink shade, color, and impression are particularly deceptive since they may have been caused originally by a dry quill, a newly dipped quill, or a honing or change of quill and later by faded ink owing to moisture in the manuscript or other damage. Heat from fire, on the other hand, may cause carbonization, so that the ink becomes darker, the impression sharper.

Wherever the collective evidence is particularly strong, the added glosses or letters are distinguished in the edition by enclosure in parentheses; glosses which I suspect to have been added but for which conclusive evidence is lacking are indicated by an asterisk. The analysis of these glosses must be understood, however, to be an approximation only. In designating them I have proceeded conservatively, so that there may be some glosses set off as added which are in fact original and quite probably a number, especially of single words (i.e., not in a double gloss), are not set off which were in fact added.

The nature of the added material is varied. The form which occurs most frequently is that of an alternative gloss, such as 17.43 ic forgnide (ł gewanige), dust (ł myll), fen (ł lam), stræta (ł lanena), 24.6 (cneoris ł) cynren. The other forms are:

1) Grammatical variants, such as Ps. 23.4 clænre (ł clæne), onfeng (ł onfehð), idel (ł idlum), swor (ł swereð), 26.3 þæt (ł þis), 30.4 beo þu (ł þu eart).

2) Addition of ic, þu, or he before or after verbs, e.g., 21.4 (þu) eardast, 21.25 forsyhð (he).

3) A single word (not an alternate), for which there is no lemma, such as 24.5 (to), 22.4 (þonne).

4) A change or correction made in an original gloss by the insertion or addition of one or two letters, e.g., 20.8 gehihte(ð), 20.11 forspil(d)est, 20.13 set(te)st, 21.25 ondræd(að), 23.6,7 g(e)atu, 28.9 (ge)gearwigend. In a few instances, not only has a letter been inserted, but part of the original gloss has been erased, such as 18.15 min(r)e, final s (?) erased, and 24.5 lær (ðu), altered from lære.[1]

Gloss and Lemma. Throughout the psalter and canticles there are a number of glosses which render the Latin, not of the GPs. of the manuscript, but of the RPs. or of some other variant reading. Examples are: 9.12

[1] The number of original double glosses is approximately 260. They occur continuously throughout the text, but some sections have a denser concentration of them than others. Their distribution can be seen in the following arbitrary breakdown: Pss. 1-16, 4 original double glosses; Pss. 17-31, 60; Pss. 32-50, 41; Pss. 51-75, 35; Pss. 76-100, 54; Pss. 101-125, 28; Pss. 126-150, 26; Canticles, 12. There are three original triple glosses, at 18.2, 67.26, and 79.15, and one instance of four glosses to a single lemma, at 24.21. The functions of these glosses are similar to those of the Added Gloss, i.e., to give (1) an alternate word, as bodiað ł cyðað, (2) a phonological variant, as geatu ł gatu, (3) a grammatical variant, as wæron ł synd, or (4) a gloss to the RPs. reading, as gesette (RPs. statuit) ł sealde (GPs. dabit).

wundru. studia (RPs. mirabilia), 26.8 ic sohte. exquisiuit (RPs. quaesiui), 64.11 ondrencende. inebriat (RPs. inebrians), 94.3 micel is. magnus (RPs. magnus est), 146.2 somnigende. congregabit (RPs. congregans), and Cant. VI.33 hatheortnesse. Fel (D Furor). Such occurrences are common in the glossed psalters of the Gallican version. In most cases these glosses which render other readings were probably caused by the glossator's indiscriminate copying of a source, which may have been a glossed RPs. (as K's copying of D or a D-type gloss) or a mixed psalter. It is also possible that a glossator had a RPs. near at hand and occasionally glossed what he saw in it rather than in his own text. These alternate readings in G are of particular interest because the majority of them appear also in J (see "A Note on Relationship" below). If we assume for the moment that G served as a source for J, it would be obvious that the J glossator copied such glosses mechanically, not noticing the difference between the gloss and the Latin both of G and of his own text.[1] It would be more difficult, however, to ascertain how the RPs. renderings originally came about in G, although the process may have been identical with that of J and K.

There are relatively few mechanical errors in the gloss, and those which do appear are of kinds commonly attested in psalter glosses. For instance, as the glossator's eye moved up and down from the gloss line to the Latin, or back and forth from a source to his own manuscript, he sometimes saw a word a line or two above or below the one he was glossing. At 21.28 he glossed familie, onwealdeð, while glancing at dominabitur in the line below; at 53.7 he looked two lines below to eripuisti and glossed disperde with þu generedest. In a very few places the glossator copied part of the lemma into the gloss, such as oferbos (superbos) at 118.21 and oncensa (incensa) at 79.17, or carried the lemma over entirely into the gloss, as te (te) at 103.27, da (da) at 118.73.

[1] Cf. a similar instance of mechanical copying in K; see the Sisams' ed., p. 18.

The division of Latin words or separation of syllables in the manuscript often caused the glossator to go astray. For example, me- is separated from -tuentes at 32.18 and is rendered me ondrædende; at Ps. 77.35 excelsus appears as ex celsus because of the erasure of s, and the glossator has rendered is mære, taking ex as es or est. Sometimes he misunderstood one Latin word for another, rendered a compound literally part by part, or confused a lemma with another similar to it, e.g., amouit at 65.20 is taken as a form of amo and glossed lufode, inuia at 62.3 is rendered on wege, and iustitia at 70.2 is confused with iniustitia and glossed unrihtwisnesse. Further errors of a like kind are: 33.13 adylgode. diligit (taken as if deleuit), 49.16 forþam þe. quare (as if quoniam or quia), 63.11 reccend. recti (as if rector), 103.11 on æcere. onagri (taken literally, on [in?] agri), 118.164 ic lufude. dixi (taken as if dilexi), and 134.5 dagum. diis (as if diebus).

A few Latin words, most of which occur after Ps. 40, are not glossed. The words most frequently unglossed are Hebrew place names or proper names, such as sinae, chanaan, iudea, galaad, abraham, and beelfegor. Place or proper names which recur often, e.g., israhel, sion, hierusalem, aegyptus, and iacob, are usually glossed but occasionally passed over. The repetition in a given passage of a common phrase, e.g., quoniam in eternum misericordia eius (in Ps. 135), or a common word, such as deus or sanctus, may account for the absence of a gloss. In addition, there is a small group of words which may not have been glossed because of the presence of a different reading in the RPs.[1] Examples are Ps. 57.10 intellegerent (RPs. producant), 58.4 ceperunt (RPs. occupauerunt), 59.8 partibor (RPs. diuidam), 64.5 atriis (RPs. tabernaculis), 67.13 specie, (? RPs. species), 67.17 coagulatos (RPs. uberes), 67.19 cepisti (also not glossed in J; RPs. captiuam duxit), 75.10 mansuetos (RPs. quietos), 75.12 munera (?Psalterium Mozarabicum, dona), and 88.41 firmamentum (RPs. munitiones).

[1] Cf. ed. of K, p. 20, and examples in K at Pss. 21.11, 26.4, 27.1, 30.13, 30.19, 34.5, 34.16.

In Appendix II of the edition of K, Kenneth Sisam notes that "the glossator or scribe of G snatches at resemblances between English words without regard for sense,"[1] but at least two of the ten examples he cites may plausibly be explained in a different way (see my textual notes for on dust, 61.5, and onstyred, 68.24). It is true, however, that there are some erroneous or garbled glosses which appear to have been induced by a similarity to another word. The more obvious instances, in addition to the ones given by Sisam, of such "snatching" are: 54.21 defecit. georade (= geteorade), 77.70 sustulit. naðær (= abær), 93.21 condempnabunt. generiað (= genyðeriað), 111.9 dispersit. he lædde (= he dælde), VI.28 Gens. beoð (= þeod), and 70.20 ostendisti. neosedest (= eowedest). The gloss 7 forst to Etham at 73.15 appears to be an attempt to make sense out of a similar gloss in H, and forts, itself a corruption of fortis in D, even though OE forst has no relation to Etham. To explain all such questionable glosses as corruptions of a source or as a chance resemblance to another word can, however, be misleading, since there may be evidence that the glossator actually rendered what he understood in the lemma. Some glosses in G which appear to be simple corruptions are in fact ambiguous; e.g., see the textual notes to heortnessa (54.9), micclum (71.14), astyrode (73.20), and offrige (118.76).

The usual method in interlinear renderings is to gloss word for word without concern for syntax, and this habit prevails with few exceptions in the glossed psalters. There are numerous instances in G, however, in which the glossator has changed the word order of the gloss from that of the Latin, which suggests that occasionally he read forward in his text and then wrote the gloss in what for him was the normal order. In Ps. 14 he consistently inverts in the gloss the Latin word order of possessive constructions: vs. 1 in tabernaculo tuo. on þinum getelde; vs. 3 in corde suo. on his heortan, in lingua sua. on his tungan; vs. 4 in conspectu

eius. on his gesihþe; and vs. 5 pecuniam suam. his feoh.[1] Also in 14.1 he inverts the postadjective order: in monte sancto suo. on þinum þam halgan munte þinan. Elsewhere he alters in the gloss the Latin order of verb constructions, such as 9.19 obliuio erit. bið ofergyttol and 43.18 nec obliti sumus te. ofergiten we ne syndon þe; or of verb and subject or object, as 13.5 non erat timor. ege ne wæs, 17.33 qui precinxit me. se me begyrde, and 17.39 confringam illos. ic hy geswence. In addition, he may change the order of pronouns, e.g., 7.4 si feci istud. ic þæs dyde, 15.1 speraui in te. in þe ic gehyht, and 21.29 ipse dominabitur. he [ ]yldeð sylf.[2] Relevant here, also, are the five instances in which he separates a prepositional adverb from what normally would stand as a quasi-compound: 36.15 decipiant. hy awurpon ut, 65.12 transiuimus. we foran þurh, 87.17 transierunt. hy foran þurh, 104.13 pertransierunt. hy foron þurh, and 138.8 descendero. ic astige adune.[3]

Free translations of the text occur rarely and the intended meaning of those which do appear is not always clear. At Ps. 39.10 the glossator has added emphasis to the Latin by rendering domine tu scisti as driht þu þe ealle þing wast; similarly, hominem is glossed ealle men in the context qui docet hominem scientiam (93.10). To the Latin deus diiudicat in 81.1 the glossator seems to have felt the need for an object, since he translates god eow demð, and again in 147.17 he introduces an indirect object: Mittit cristallum suum. he asendeð him gimstan his. At 48.6 timebo. ic me ondræde and IV.19 reduxit. he me lædde, in which me makes no sense, it is questionable whether a free (but mistaken)

[1] See further 15.4, 17.16, 51.7, VI.16, XV.3. Cf. the unusual changes of word order in the gloss in I, e.g., in circuitu eius. ymbhwyrfte on his (75.12) and ex inferno inferiori. helle of þære nyþeran (85.13).

[2] The sign 7 occurs in the gloss a few times where there is no lemma in the text or a variant reading elsewhere which would account for it, but an explanation for some of the instances may be in a parallel construction found in the same verse. See 16.5, 16.14, 17.26, 80.7, 104.1, 143.2, 148.10.

translation is intended, because me could possibly be an error for a prefix on- to the verb which the glossator has neglected to erase.

Psalters C and I are comparatively rich in glosses which render an interpretive or theological sense of certain words in the Latin, and in D there are marginal or interlinear Latin glosses from patristic commentary. Some of the Latin explanations in D are glossed in K and possibly also in I.[1] Interpretive glosses appear also in G, and since some of them do not appear in other psalters, they attest (if we assume no other glossed source for them) to the glossator's theological interest in and knowledge of his text. Most of the interpretive glosses in the psalters are to proper names, especially Hebrew words which glossators always had difficulty in rendering, and it is not improbable that scribes working with the psalter text had a list of such hard words with explanations. Furthermore, there is evidence that the glossators of G and I took pains to find an explication for particular words in a commentary, such as that of Cassiodorus.[2] Glosses in G which probably derive from another glossed source are sion. heannessum (19.3, as D), hismahelite. synnahyrendra (82.7, as D), siccimam. byrþen (107.8, as C), moab. deofol (107.10, as D), and hierusalem. celestis uita. heofenlic lif (136.6, as D [unglossed]). Glosses which appear in G but not in other OE psalters are cham. aweg anam (77.51), initiati sunt. þeoddon (105.28), maturitate. gelomlice (118.147), cedar. syfullum (119.5), and effrata. sceawungum (131.6).[3] Finally, there are three glosses which may be interpretive, but for which the evidence is uncertain: usuris. micclum (71.14), adinuentionibus. heldum (76.18), and tabescam. ic aþolige (138.21).

Vocabulary. While double glosses are numerous in G, and some Latin words are rendered by several different words

(not in a double gloss) throughout the text,[1] the number of words to appear for the first time is small. The following is a list of those words which appear in G but not in the other psalters; rare words in Old English are marked with †:

ætbred. auferas, 140.8
ætgæd †. simul, 82.6
ardlice. uelociter, 68.18
ME blast. turbo, V.14
efthwerfende †. rediens, 77.39
gehlutrudu †. probatum, 11.7
gewidlige †. profanabo, 88.35
gryre †. tremor, 54.6
healica. excelsus, 46.3
hnifel †. uerticem, 7.17
modignesse †. benignitatem, 51.5
naðing †. nihil, 75.6
preostas. sacerdotes, 77. 64 settungum †. insidiis, 9.29
underleigð. subponit, 36.24

Most of the new compounds not recorded in the dictionaries are translation words induced mechanically by the lemmata; of the following, hlyncoton may be an error:

edblewð. efflorebit, 102.15
emblissian. exultent, 67.4
forhoredan (MS forhosedan). ultorem (taken as if adultorem), 8.3
hlyncoton. claudicauerunt, 17.46
oferwanude. distuli, VI.27
samodweaxe. concrescat, VI.2
tobiddað. adorate, 98.9

An interlinear gloss as dense in vocabulary as is G would not be complete if there were not a few problematic words which defy an editor's interpretation. The hard words that have tempted speculation but yielded no ready explanation are þone forhte (20.3), seon (41.11), ætende (77.38), tofan (101.4), and fænn (103.3).

A Note on Relationship. The question concerning the interrelationship of the various manuscripts has long interested editors and students of the Old English psalters, and while there are many conjectures about a near or close relationship between two psalters or among a group of them, no one has adduced conclusive evidence that one of the manuscripts was actually employed by the scribe or glossator of another. Most recently, Kenneth Sisam, following an elaborate discussion of "The Gloss D and Its Relations," has concluded: "Unless the corrector of E used D..., no instance has appeared where direct copying of one extant gloss from another is probable."[1] Mr. Sisam goes on to remark that we should not expect an instance of "direct copying" since "we must reckon the English glossed psalters of the tenth and eleventh centuries in hundreds." Whether there were "hundreds" of such psalters at one time seems to me a moot point, but even if we allow the possibility of their existence, this in itself would not render it improbable that two or more of the remaining psalters were directly related. Moreover, the fact that at least one group of psalters originated at the same place (FGHJ, and possibly B, at Winchester) might lead one to suspect that two or more of these came into direct contact, even if many more psalter manuscripts, now lost, were available there. The purpose of this note is to suggest that there may have been such a contact between two manuscripts, MS Arundel 60 (J) and MS Cotton Vitellius E. xviii.

[1] E.g., at different places honor is glossed by ar, weorðnesse, arweorðunge, weorðscipe, and wurðmynt; tabernaculum by geteld, eardunge, and eardungstowa; immaculatus by unforgripendlicu, unbesmiten, ungewemme, and unwemmedum; thronus by setl, þrymsetl, and heahsetl; ecclesia by gelaðunga, gesomnunga, cyric, and haliga gesamnunge; and filius by cild, bearn, and sunum.

Earlier scholarship has observed that G and J are in many ways related. On the basis of his partial collation Lindelöf decided that "da berühungen zwischen G und J vorkommen und z.t. sogar sehr einleuchtend sind, behandeln wir hier die beiden hss. gemeinschaftlich, obgleich anderseits nicht selten jede von beiden ihre eigenen wege zu gehen scheint."[2] He also conjectured that J may have been dependent at different points on G, not G on J.[3]

[1] Ed. of K, p. 75.
[2] Lindelöf (1904), p. 111.
[3] Ibid., p. 115.

Both Wildhagen[1] and Heinzel[2] (who uses Lindelöf's collations together with one of his own) make similar assertions without making the relationship any more specific. The kinds of evidence cited by all three are (1) readings common to GJ which do not appear in other psalters, (2) shared renderings which are unusual or erroneous, and (3) glosses in GJ which agree with only one other psalter.[3] This evidence alone, it must be admitted, does not in itself establish with certainty that one of the two manuscripts was used in the preparation of the other. But other evidence may be adduced.

In his edition of J, Oess lists[4] 243 instances in which a gloss renders the reading of the RPs. and not that of the glossator's Gallican text. Of these glosses, 116, or almost one-half of J's, appear at the same places in G. The number of G's RPs. glosses which agree with those of J is greatest in Pss. 1-50: J = 110, G = 65 in agreement. The correspondence continues throughout the text with approximately the same 2 to 1 ratio: Pss. 51-100, J = 65, G = 25 in agreement; Pss. 101-150, J = 50, G = 22 in agreement; canticles, J = 18, G = 4 in agreement. Oess cites thirty-four glosses,[5] with which G agrees 12 times, which render a lemma that occurs a line or two above or below the line being glossed; the correspondences appear especially in Pss. 8-30, 53-61. The sporadic appearance of 7, for which there is no Latin authority, is a peculiarity which G and J share ten times, in Pss. 10.7, 16.11, 16.14, 17.26, 77.23, 80.7, 104.1, 118.167, 137.4, and IV.9. But this evidence, like that given by Lindelöf, Wildhagen, and Heinzel, while it clearly indicates some kind of near relationship, is still susceptible to the interpretation proposed in different ways by Heinzel[1] and Sisam[2] that G and J both derive from a common ancestor.

There is, however, another point, which seems to me to attest to a proximal relationship, and that is the number of original Latin errors in G and J which are corrected in G. At 49.19 dolus, the original reading in GJ, is corrected in G to dolos; GJ animam meam (93.17) is corrected in G to anima mea; GJ deieceret (105.27) is corrected in G to dei-; GJ ipse (105.43) is corrected in G to ipsi, GJ dispersionis (146.2) is corrected in G to -es; and GJ eis (146.10) is corrected in G to ei; similar examples will be found at Pss. 71.10, 73.17, 76.7, 87.12, 88.20, 88.35, 90.7. At Ps. 45.4 both originally read sonauerunt, but in both -a- is erased. The MS division in G of me — tuentibus (59.6) has induced the mechanical gloss me in both psalters.

Psalter relationships are extraordinarily difficult to establish with certainty, and chance similarities can easily lead to unwarranted assumptions, but when two psalters which originate from the same church[3] share numerous points of likeness, it seems as justifiable to assume that one is derived in part directly from the other as it is to assert that they proceed from a common model. The mixed dependency of most of the Gallican psalters suggests that scribes and glossators, in the process of making up a new redaction, employed from time to time not one model but several, and in the course of the composition of G and J there is a considerable likelihood that one of the manuscripts was directly influenced by the other.

THE PLAN OF THE TEXT

THE Latin text and glosses are presented here as they stand in the manuscript, with as little apparatus as possible. Since the gloss runs above the line of Latin, the two are easily distinguished, and since it did not seem necessary to use different type for each, both are printed in roman. Italic type in the Latin is used to indicate letters, parts of words, or words which are missing from the manuscript. Wherever the Latin is missing, it has been provided from the common Gallican Psalter reading printed in Weber or, in the case of psalm introductions, from a known source, such as In Psal. Lib. Exeg. Square brackets in the glosses and psalm introductions indicate that part of a word or an entire word is missing; when brackets appear over a Latin word which stands or originally stood on a margin where the gloss line is missing, they represent the assumption that a gloss originally stood there. A Latin word with neither gloss nor brackets above it indicates that it was not glossed. Because of the loss of parchment in many of the leaves, it is not possible, in a large percentage of the cases, to estimate the approximate number of letters missing in a word; hence the brackets are spaced uniformly throughout. Colons are used for letters which are badly damaged or faded and hence illegible. Glosses enclosed in parentheses are those added by the main glossator; the asterisk designates glosses about which there is a question as to whether they were original or added. Abbreviations in the Latin have been expanded without comment, but retained in the glosses wherever it is uncertain, as in forðā (m or n?), what expansion should be made. The abbreviations of drihten and its inflected forms appear in the edition as they stand in the manuscript. The point which normally stands above y in the Old English has been omitted. The word division in both Latin and Old English has been normalized.

The manuscript punctuation, which is confused and often uncertain, has not been reproduced, and the Latin is punctuated according to the standard practice of most of the printed OE psalters. The cauda in the Latin and accent marks in both Latin and glosses have been retained.

Alterations and erasures are observed in the textual notes; if the erased letters are illegible a reading from Weber or another glossed psalter (usually J) is given as the possible original. For Latin alterations I have attempted to use the terms cor. (= corrected) and changed consistently, the former to signify that an error has been corrected, the latter that one reading has been altered to another (in the majority of these cases, both readings, the original and altered, are attested in Weber). The terms read and for have separate meanings; the first signifies my emendation of a scribal (or glossatorial) error or suggested normalization of an unusual form, while the second points to a gloss which is a completion of a gloss left unfinished in the manuscript. A comparison of glosses from other psalters is given only when it may serve to explain a reading in G, but such comparison does not imply that it is a result of a complete collation of all the glossed psalters. Readings cited from ABDFHJ have been checked against the MS involved, but for citations from CEIKP I have relied on the editions alone. With the exception of errors involving case, number, and tense, the notes provide discussion of glosses which appear to be inaccurate or unusual renderings of the Latin. Although the notes for a given verse often contain various kinds of information, they have been arranged together rather than partitioned into separate sections, since a point of one kind may frequently be pertinent to a point of another.

13 þearfa (ł þearfena): here in the sense of 'destitute.' The destitute or poor and the foreign are related in a passage cited in BTD, under elþeodig: pauperibus et peregrinus semper humilis. þearfum and elþeodigum symble eaþmod. 14 gehyrt: as J. gehirtan glosses refrigerer elsewhere in OE (see BTD). For the particular sense here, note the citation in BTDS: Ond þa mid þy þe þæt min werod gehyrted and gestilled wæs. quae res quum anime quietiorem fecisset exercitum. In Psal. Lib. Exeg. (P.L. 93.691) explains refrigeratam as quietam. Cf. I gereste. Lindelöf (Der Lambeth Ps., Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicae, XLIII: 3, 28) considers gereste a "sehr freie übertragung." habeam: a rare var., attested in Weber, of the GPs. abeam. ic habbe: lemma taken as a form of habeo.

10 fordydest: perhaps an error for fandodest, as DK. Or the glossator may not have known the lemma, probasti, and sought the meaning in the synonym, examinasti, in the same vs. Then, he might have misread examino as exanimo, 'to destroy.' Cf. CGL V.291.53: examinat, aequaliter iudicat uel occidit. It may also be of some relevance that Rolle explains, "thou examynd us, that is, thou purged oure syn . . .," and G's 'thou destroyed (our sin)' would be roughly equivalent. 12 rotnesse ł frofer: as D (rotnisse ł frofr); the lemma may have been confused with refugium. 16 ⁊ gehyrað: RPs. et audite.

10 cynigas: read cyningas, but cf. K 71.11 reges. cinigas. saba: a letter between a and b erased; cf. J sabba. 14 micclum: as H miclum. The glossator of D confused usuris with urina and glossed micgum, and Roeder queries about the gloss in GH, "sollten die Lesungen ... missglückste Versuche sein, die Lesung der Hs. D zu bessern?" There may, however, be a better explanation for micclum as a gloss to usuris. Cassiod. explains that 'Vsurae ab usu appellatare sunt, quae creditae pecuniae procurant semper augmentum," and Hieronymus (P.L. 26.982) comments that "usura est plus accipere quam dare." Cf. also the definitions of usura in Maigne D'Arnis, Lexicon Manuale . . ., ed. J. P. Migne (Paris, 1890). In the sense of 'more' or of 'excess' micclum is an apt gloss, since it glosses nimium, 'too much,' in Aelfric's glossary and is used thus adverbially elsewhere in OE.

H and forts), and one wonders if he did not see something in ham. The source of D's gloss, fortis, may be In Psal. Lib. Exeg.: "Ethan interpretatur fortis, siue robustus." 16 es: a final letter erased; cf. ea: a final letter erased; cf. J eam. 20 astyrode (ł aþystrode): the second gloss is probably a correction of the first, which may have been induced by similarity of sound. The same error (?) is also made at 68.24: obscurentur. sy (!) onstyred. Since a recorded meaning of astyrian is 'to remove,' it is conceivable that the glossator may have intended 'they have removed light' = blinded = obscured, perhaps reflecting Cassiod. "... obscuritas... quoniam lumen sapientiae perdiderunt."

11 him: cor. from his by same hand. 13 utre: changed from utrem. 15 sæteorode: read wæterode, as IJK. It is not unlikely that the s was induced by an association of wæter- with sæ. 16 petra: a final letter appears to be erased. 17 *gewrehton ł gremedon: the glossator may have taken excitauerunt as exacerbauerunt; cf. 77.40 *concitauerunt. awrechton ł gremedon, where exacerbauerunt appears in the same vs. gewrecan has the recorded meaning, 'give effect to anger' (see BTD & S), which is apt in this context. Cf. P 9.23. inaquoso: cor. from inaquosa. hyra drugunge ł on þurst[ ]: also at 77.40. The pronoun, hyra, is a free rendering, but one which seems to have been suggested by a passage from commentary. Cassiod. observes about in siccitate [the RPs. reading for inaquoso] that

"non tantum terrae quam mentis, qui tot miraculis compluti, perfidiae suae sterilitate siccati sunt . . . "; Haymo (P.L. 116.459) explains similarly, " 'Excelsum in inaquoso,' id est, deserto, quod natura inaquosum est, significat ariditatem cordis eorum." Rolle follows this tradition: "in stede withouten watire. that is. in thaire dry hert, that has na wetynge of his grace." The alternate gloss, on þurste, which appears in G alone at this verse, probably represents the interpretation, 'dryness of heart' = a thirst for grace. 20 fleow: gloss unfinished. 21 geælde: see Wildhagen's note in C. 22 forþam þe: RPs. var. quoniam. 23 ⁊ ofer: as J; no authority for et.

I pæþes. BTD enters siþ with the meaning 'path, way' under definition VI. ne: read he. 51 7 aweg anam: Cham, a Hebrew place-name, is interpreted in In Psal. Lib. Exeg. as "Cham, id est, in quibus regnat diabolus. Cham enim callidus interpretatur. Quis autem callidor quam uersipellis ille serpens antiquus. Utique nullus." The glossator seems to have taken primitias in apposition with primogenitum and Cham as a preterite in apposition with Et percussit, hence the ond preceding aweg anam. The choice of aweg anam is an exact rendering of the sense of the verse. The commentary equates Cham with 'nullus' and explains " . . . percutit Dominus, id est, ad nihilum deducit . . . ".

58 wæron elnigende (ł feogende): the first gloss is to RPs. emulati sunt. For feogende as a gloss to emulationem, the following points are pertinent: feogan is a frequent gloss to odio (see BTD), odiis glosses inimicitiis at CGL V.125.21, and inimicitia explains aemulatio at CGL IV.62.51. Note also OHG emulare. hassen, Diefenbach I. wæron hatigende: this gloss is misplaced and belongs above emulationem = RPs. emulati sunt. 63 oðde [ ]end[ ]: it is uncertain if oðde is a separate word or a part of the fragmentary gloss. oðde might be an error for oððe, 'or,' a frequent way (although never in G) of indicating a second gloss. For the fragment, cf. FJ cwyþende.

101. 4 tofan: this is a hard gloss. It may be pertinent that J glosses cremium, meos 'moss.' 'Moss' is apt since cremium is explained as 'radices aride que iacte a fluminibus in ripas' (Ahd. Gl. V.304.38) and as aridas herbas in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae; in CGL IV.121.8 muscus is glossed genus herbae. If the G glossator thought of cremia as something 'cast up' or 'dispersed about,' tofaran (intransitively, 'to disperse') would be an apt gloss. I query, therefore, that tofan is a contracted form of the past participle, tofaren, 'dispersed.' For a similar instance of contraction in G, cf. 89.15: uidimus. we gesan. 7 nicticorax: changed from nocticorax. domicilio: changed from domocilio. solere: as DK; solitudines in the same vs. may have suggested this particular word. 8 westensetla: as K; cf. OHG wuostan-sedalo. solitarius, Graff I.1084.

27 eis: cor. from eos. 28 teorode: BTD (under tirgan) relates tirgan, 'to vex,' with teorian, 'to tire,' mentioning ME tarien and citing terwyd. lassatus. fatigatus from the Promptorium Parvulorum. Skeat also cites tirgan as an etymon of 'tarry.' teorode, with its usual meaning in OE, 'tired' or 'fainted,' is not an exact gloss to exacerbauit, but may be explained by the possibility that in late OE teorian and tirgan had become semantically confused, i.e., both might mean 'to tire' or 'delay.' Since the other psalters (except ABC) all gloss the lemma with a form of tirgan, G's glossator might have sought for another form and chosen teorian.

This is apt, since Cassiod. comments: "Sic enim in culturas daemonum ritusque transierant, ut iam non Domini, sed daemonum serui esse probarentur." A similar ellipsis occurs in OHG glosses to the same passage: iniciati sunt. heilizidun, Ahd. Gl. I.524.32. 29 hypstan: read hysptan. hyspan, 'to scorn,' is inexact to irrito, 'to provoke.' The glossator may have rendered from context: 'They ate the sacrifices of the dead' (vs. 28), viz., they scorned or reviled God in doing so. 31 ounrihtwisnesse: read on unriht-.

Cassiod. also explains cedar as 'tenebrae,' but then comments: "Hoc ad saeculi huius pertinet amatores, qui tenebrosis actibus inuoluti, illa magis diligunt unde perire noscuntur. Sed ut uerbi huius breuiter noscamus originem, Cedar Ismael filius fuit, qui genti suae nomen dedit, cuius fines usque ad Medos Persasque prolati sunt: hi nunc Sarraceni appellantur. Quo uocabulo competentur significat peccatores, inter quos se adhuc habitare suspirat." Also cf. Hieronymus on cedar at Ps. 28.5 (P.L. 26.901). I take syfullum as an error for synfullum, reflecting Cassiod. explanation, 'peccatores.' 6 ælðeodig: as FJ. That the gloss renders incola exactly in context, cf. In Psal. Lib. Exeg.: "Incola enim, qui alienam terram incolit, quasi peregrinatur . . . ". 7 ceapun[ ]: cf. FJ orceapunga, D -um.

128. 3 ofe: for ofer; the gloss is uncompleted because -ra of the lemma is crowded above the Latin line. iniquitem: read -tatem. 4 gefylð: as J gefilleð; concīdo, 'to cut up,' confused with concido, 'to fall utterly.' hnollas: as DFIJK. Lindelöf (Der Lambeth Ps., Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicae, XLIII: 3[1914], 29) suggests that the glossator saw uertices. But note WW 291.9 ceruix. hnoll, and 156.7 uertex. hnol. Rolle, at this psalm, translates ceruices as skalkys (cf. Icel. skalli, 'a bald head'), and uerticem at Ps. 67.23 also as skalke. See further the reference to Wycliffe in BTD under hnol.

Cassiod., e.g., remarks: "Et merito se supra eos tabescere dicit sancta pietas, quoniam dum hic sustinentur diutius ad correctionem. . . . Hic salmus Dauid propie scriptus extra numerum cum pugnauit cum Goliad hic psalmus in Ębreis codicibus non habetur sed a lxx interpretibus editus est et idcirco repudeandus

1 Pusillus eram inter fratres meos et adolescentior in domo patris mei pascam oues patris mei. 2 Manus meę fecerunt organum et digiti m*ei* aptauerunt psalterium. 3 Et quis annuntiauit domino meo ipse dominus ipse omnium exaudito*r*. 4 *I*pse misit angelum *suum et tu*lit me de ouibus [f.131^{v}] patris mei et unxit me in misericordia unctionis suę. 5 Fratres mei boni et magni et non fuit beneplacitum in eis domino. 6 Exiui obuiam alienigenę et maledixit me in simulacris suis. 7 Ego autem euaginato ab eo ipsius gladio amputaui caput eius et abstuli opprobrium a filiis israhel.

Prayer

Omnipotens et misericors deus clementiam tuam suppliciter deprecor ut me famulum tuum tibi fideliter concedas deseruire et perseuerantiam bonam et felicem consummationem mihi largiri digneris et hoc psalterium quod in conspectu tuo cantaui ad salutem et ad remedium anime meę proficiat sempiternum. amen.

151. 1 pascam: read pascebam. 7 Erasure before ab.

Prayer. On the use of this prayer and its appearance in other English MSS, see the ed. of K by Celia and K. Sisam, p. 6 (para. 11 and n.2), p. 284. It is significant that the prayer occurs also in J (f.134^{v}) where, according to Sisams, it was added later. deseruire and -ue- in perseuerantiam added in postmedieval (probably 16th-century) hand. The line beginning anime and ending amen (which agrees with MS Harley 863) is written over an erasure in the same, late hand.

It occurs a few times in the cmpd. blæstbelg, but only once, according to BTD & S, as a simplex, and that is in Cædmon: Sæ grundas suþwind fornam bæþweges blæst. BTDS enters one citation of a form, blæs: þurh ðæs windes blæs. Cf. Diefenbach I: turbo. wint; flatus. blasse. blast o. wind. See Sisams' note in K, pp. 45-6 (incorrectly, it is stated there that G glosses turbo with þoden). 15 læteme[ ]: was luto confused with a comparative form of lento? Cf. WW 430.15: lento. late. 16 Vt: V in black ink over erasure.

Haymo (P.L. 116.711) explains: " 'expandit' longe 'alas suas,' protectiones . . . "; cf. Rolle: "Crist spredis twa wengys of charite."
